EXPLANATIONS

The Bibliography is in the form of a dictionary catalog, with author, title, subject, editor, illustrator, engraver and other entries all in one alphabet.

The main entry is under the name of the author, or, for an anonymous book, under the first word of the title. Here the fullest information about the book is given, in the following order: Author, title, place, publisher, date, number of pages, illustrations, plates, size, series, and descriptive annotations. Here also are given the references to the bibliographies of Colas, and Lipperheide, and numbers by which Library of Congress cards can be ordered.

Under the subject of which the book treats the information is limited to author, title, and date of publication. The subject is followed by the author's name. Turn to entry under author's name for full information.

Titles entries, likewise, are only guides to the main entry. The title is followed by the author's name.

Entries under names of engravers, illustrators, and editors, are also brief, giving only the name of the author (i.e. the main entry) and title of the work.

For example the book Antike mode, by Max von Boehn, will be found under 1, the author's name: Boehn, Max von; 2, the title: Antike mode; 3, the subject: Ancient times.

The main entry should always be consulted, since only in the main entry will be found all the titles under which a book and its translations were published, and therefore can be found listed in library catalogs.

The articles a, an, and the and their equivalents in other languages, have been ignored in filing. i.e. L'image de la femme is found under the letter i, not under L.

ä, ö, ü, å, and ø in the Teutonic languages are filed as if spelled ae, oe, ue, etcetera.

For further explanations see the Introduction, pages vii-ix.

PREFACE

The Bibliography, international in scope, is a list of approximately eighty-four hundred works on costume and adornment, including books in all languages.

The books are listed in a dictionary catalog with author, subject, and title entries, and references, in one alphabet. Full bibliographic information is given for each book: the author's name in full, title, illustrator, engraver, place, publisher, date, paging, size, illustrations and plates (with color indicated). The entries include references to the H. W. Wilson Company's Costume index, to Colas's Bibliographie du Costume, and to Lipperheide's Katalog der Kostüm-bibliothek. Library of Congress card numbers are also given.

The Dictionary catalog form was decided upon after consultation, by the questionnaire method, with a number of librarians and others chiefly interested. The decision in favor of this form was practically unanimous. The main entry for each book is under the name of the author, which has been verified and given in complete form wherever possible. In many cases an effort had to be made to find the complete and best-known form of the name. Research in this connection resulted in many corrections and changes and the discovery of numerous pseudonyms (noms de plumes) in which case entry has been made under the real name with reference from the pseudonym. It was also possible to supply authors' names for many books published anonymously and listed under titles only in other bibliographies. Such names are indicated in the Bibliography by being enclosed in brackets. The same indication is used in the case of the title of the book. A note then tells where the title is to be found, e.g. "cover title," "title on portfolio," "title appears on each plate," "title appears on some plates," "plates are signed." The name of the artist or engraver is given whenever possible. Brief descriptive annotations are given for books whose title does not indicate their costume values, and information is given about other editions, changes in title and translations.

Each phase of costume treated is brought out under subject as fully as possible; e.g. the country and type, military costume, arms and armor, orders of knighthood and chivalry, religious orders, etc. Ecclesiastical costume is arranged by country and period, or by church.

In research of all sorts, a definite knowledge of the necessary bibliographic sources is of incalculable value in saving time and labor. The compilers have found from personal experience that the subject indexes of even the most modern libraries are practically useless in dealing with specialized problems such as those involved in the study of costume. While all the larger libraries are rich in valuable material, it is often obtainable only by much painstaking search.

The compilers believe that this is by far the most extensive and complete bibliography of costume ever offered, covering every period and country from prehistoric times to the present day, as well as every specialized phase of the subject.

In connection with the present work the word costume is used in its broadest sense. Not only is costume treated from the standpoint of clothing and decoration of the human body, but works are included on such allied subjects as masks, tattooing, body-painting, arms and armor, tailoring and cutting, military, naval and civil uniforms, ecclesiastical and academic costume, coiffure, hygiene, esthetics of costume, dress reform, jewelry, and accessories (the umbrella, muff, gloves, corsets, fans, etc.) Books on each subject and country are arranged in groups by period. There are many references for native tribes of Africa, Australia, India, etc., and for American Indians.

Fashion periodicals are listed under title, under country of publication and by date. Under the latter entry it is possible to ascertain exactly what fashion periodicals were published during any particular period. The list also includes some periodicals in the fields of ethnology and history, containing notable costume material.

Painters of historical subjects, illustrators, stage designers, cinema costumers, shoe designers, dress designers, milliners, costume students, historians, bibliographers, sociologists, ethnologists, collectors, museums, libraries, advertising agencies, manufacturers, book dealers, students of dramatics, directors of pageants, and many others, we hope will find this work of value.

The Bibliography is accompanied by an essay, "Costumes and ideologies," discussing the psychological and social factors underlying all costume development.

The compilers wish to express their thanks to the persons who have given much-appreciated advice and assistance in various stages of the work: Charles H. Hastings, chief, Card division, Library of Congress, and John W. Cronin, assistant chief; Harry M. Lydenberg, director, New York Public library; Pauline V. Fullerton, chief, Art division, New York Public library; Victor H. Paltsits, chief, American history division, New York Public library; Jean M. Murphy, Queens Borough Public library; and Paul Otlet, of the Palais Mondiale, Brussels.

INTRODUCTION

The original list was made up prior to the year 1930, from books examined and titles collected from the libraries of New York City and of Paris, Berlin, London, Brussels, Madrid, and other European cities. During the years 1937 and 1938 it was checked with titles in the catalog of the Lipperheide Costume Library, Colas's Bibliographie du Costume, and The H. W. Wilson Company's Costume Index by Isabel Monro and Dorothy E. Cook. All titles found that were within the scope of the present work have been included. Also all the titles were considered that are listed in the catalog of the Library of Congress under the subject Costume and the subjects there referred to, and also the titles so listed in the New York Public Library, up to June 1937. The list of fashion periodicals in the Periodicals directory, edited by Carolyn F. Ulrich (2d ed. 1935) was checked and used to bring the list of fashion periodicals up to date. Various other smaller lists of books on costume have been checked, for example the bibliographies issued by the Boston Public Library and by Detroit Public Library, the catalog of the King collection of the Western Reserve Historical Society, and the unpublished photostat list compiled by the Grosvenor Library, Buffalo, New York. While the smaller lists did not add many titles they sometimes uncovered English editions which might otherwise have been missed.

Altho they have some costume interest this Bibliography does not include books of the classes listed below: (1) Sumptuary laws. Lipperheide devotes a section to them, nos. 3321-3423, and Colas lists a few. (2) Books on textiles that do not show actual dress. Lipperheide lists a number, nos. 3727-3756. (3) General museum guides, unless they are outstanding and contain actual material, text or illustrations on costume. Lipperheide lists them, nos. 4999-5055. (4) Books on coats of arms. Many are listed in Lipperheide in the section on heraldry, nos. 4386-4439. (5) Laundering. Some books on this subject are listed in Lipperheide, nos. 3775-3854. (6) Titles in the Lipperheide sections on metalwork, leather, and woodwork, etc., nos. 4302-4355. Books purely on manufacturing have been omitted, but those on tailoring and cutting are included.

Authors, titles and other items of information were verified from Library of Congress cards whenever possible; otherwise from the bibliographies by Lipperheide and Colas, from cards received from the Union Catalog at the Library of Congress, from the catalogs of libraries in New York City, or from the various national and trade bibliographies and printed library catalogs. If the subject seemed clear from the title, or other information at hand, subjects were assigned without examination of the books. If the subject seemed in doubt an effort was made to find and examine the book in one of the three New York libraries: The New York Public Library, the library of Columbia University, or the Library of the Metropolitan Museum of Fine Arts.

Scope. The items listed include books, periodicals, and portfolios of plates dealing with dress, jewelry, and decoration of the body, in general and for special occasions, of all countries, times, and peoples; also items on such subjects as reform of dress, psychology of dress, art of dress; also needlework and its branches. In addition to books on costume many books of travel, history, and antiquities are listed since they include text or illustrations of costume value.

Editions. An effort has been made to list all editions in the English language, even though English was not the language in which the book was originally published. For example, a book originally in German, but also published in an English translation, will have both editions listed fully. However, if the English edition is the original it alone receives full listing, and information about the German, Spanish and other editions and translations is given in a note. The exact title of the noted books is given and references are made from changed titles to the author and title under which the information will be found.

Main entry. Fullest information is in the main entry, which is under the author's name if that is known, otherwise under the title of the book. Full cataloging information is given. If the name seemed to be complete and correct in Colas and Lipperheide, that form was accepted and used. Reference is made to the Costume Index and to the bibliographies of Colas and Lipperheide, for all titles included in these lists; and Library of Congress card numbers are given. Prices and out of print information are given only incidentally, if they were found in the process of verifying some other part of the entry. The price is the publication price.

The main entry should always be consulted. The subject entry gives only the author, title, and date of publication of the edition entered. Descriptive notes and information about other editions and about translations will be found only in the author entry. Anyone who consults the bibliography from the subject side alone will not find all the titles under which a certain book has been published and can be found in libraries.

Subjects. Books on costume in the restricted sense of clothing, will be found under the name of country, e.g. France, Germany, etc., further subdivided by period, or by region, e.g. France—1774-1789, or France—Burgundy. Books on costume not restricted to any one country or period are listed under the heading: General, with reference to related subjects. For books on costume of many countries but of one period see the name of the period, e.g. Seventeenth century; for books restricted to one section of the world see name of section or country, e.g. Europe—Middle ages, or France—Middle ages. Ecclesiastical costume, Military costume, Naval costume, and Academic costume, are listed under their appropriate headings. They are subdivided by church, country, period, or name of university, as applicable to the subject. Ceremonial and festival costume is treated in the same way. Parts of costume, and accessories, are listed under the specific name, e.g. Footwear, Gloves, Jewelry, Needlework, Lace, Buttons. Under Embroidery will be found the subhead Monograms and numerals and both show books of patterns and designs; Embroidery is divided by names of countries, e.g. Embroidery—Russia; Embroidery—India, making it possible to get a list of books on each particular type. The headings Reform of dress, Nudity, Philosophy of dress, Fashion, Psychology of dress, Hygiene of dress will guide to material of a more theoretical nature.

References to all these subjects are made from the subject General, under which the user can get a fairly clear idea of the scope and arrangement of the subjects, and how to find quickly the specific information sought.

Fashion periodicals. Several hundred fashion periodicals are listed under the heading Periodicals. They are arranged by the dates they cover in such a way that it is possible to find a list of the fashion periodicals of each quarter (e.g. 1800-1825, 1826-1850, etc.) of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, and also of the few fashion periodicals begun in the eighteenth century. The entry for each periodical states the exact years during which it was issued and whether or not it contains colored plates. Since these periodicals show authentic fashions for each year, even each season or each month, they form a highly accurate, detailed, and useful source for information about fashionable European dress (wherever worn) from the year 1770, when the Lady's magazine and museum of the belles-lettres began publication. Fashion almanacs (annuals) were also issued, beginning somewhat later, but are now so scarce that for the most part they have not been included.

Union list. Altho this Bibliography does not tell in what libraries each book may be found, references to Colas, Lipperheide, the Costume Index, and the Library of Congress Card numbers provide to some extent a union list. Most of the books for which L. C. card numbers are given can be found in the Library of Congress. If a letter other than A or AC is prefixed to the L.C. card number it means that the book is in one of the other libraries in Washington, D. C. If the prefix is A or AC, it indicates that the book is in an American library outside of Washington. The name of the library in which the book is located is always noted on the card. The Lipperheide library is now a part of the Staatliche Kunstbibliothek in the Museum in der Prinz Albrechtsstrasse (formerly the Kunstgewerbemuseum) in Berlin. Colas frequently tells where he examined the copy he describes, and the Costume Index gives for each of its 600 titles a list of American libraries which own it. The Union List of Serials, edited by Winifred Gregory, which is widely available in libraries, tells where many of the fashion periodicals can be found.

COSTUMES AND IDEOLOGIES

"The compilation of a complete bibliography, even the most concise, of the works devoted to the subject of costume, and to the incessant changes of fashion at every period, and in every country in the world, would be a considerable undertaking—a work worthy of such learning as dwelt in the monasteries of the Sixteenth Century. Such a book would, in an abbreviated form, be a sort of 'Dictionary of Origins,' useful for the 'General History of Mankind.'"

OCTAVE UZANNE. Fashion in Paris (1898)

Many people might consider that a Bibliography of costume as large in scope as the present work is "much ado about little". The compilers are convinced that such a viewpoint is superficial. The present state of civilization underlines and points the repeated and justified warnings of men of the highest scientific standing that the Social Sciences must be stressed and their study greatly intensified at this time.

The expression of the human ego in all its manifold subtleties and attitudes is perhaps nowhere more evident than in the choice which men and women make of the articles which they use to cover or ornament their persons. The exaggerated use of elaborate or alarming uniforms and fantastic headgear on the part of totalitarian dictators may point, as some claim, to a state of mind bordering on the pathological, or simply clever showmanship. It has in any case a considerable interest. If it were properly understood and analyzed, far reaching and important deductions might be reached.

Women's styles offer another complex but interesting gauge which may tell us much of the psychology of a given epoch. Their relation to the dress of men, and which sex sets the mode, certainly are questions as yet unsolved. Differentiation of the sexes, considered a mark of the degree of civilization, is expressed in dress.

In connection with the newer techniques of Psychology a profound and significant analysis of social implications, as expressed in the rather unconscious exteriorizations of costume, is now theoretically possible. It should prove important for the very reason that many hidden characteristics of the individual are written for those capable of reading them, in the subtle and unapprehended language of the attempt at conformity or adaptation shown on his back.

Two ideologies seem to be struggling for world power at the time of this writing. One, theoretically at least, with a materialistic basis and theory; the other, purportedly, with a more romantic and emotional appeal. Between the extreme polar attitudes represented by these two concepts a vast majority of the world's population continues in an evolutionary rather than a revolutionary way, with more ordinary and therefore more "normal" psychological mechanisms.

Georges Sorel, in his La Ruine du Monde Antique and other books, analyzes the part played by the national totem and mythos in national expansion and the rise and fall of powers. The outward and plainest aspect of the nation as a godhead is perhaps most clearly demonstrated as may be seen elsewhere, in symbolic appurtenances in the form of raiment and adornment on personages living and dead and their sculptural effigies. The point in question is that these ideologies permeate the lives of individuals living under their rule and influence them in practically every external detail.

When Vienna was embraced in the Anschluss, the ladies of that formerly gay capital, whose international reputation for beauty and charm is unquestioned, were forbidden their millenary use of facial cosmetics on the rather suddenly discovered grounds that these aids to nature are a form of "Jewish eroticism." The accompanying doctrine of "kinder, kirche u. küche" (now replaced by "Kultur") would also have an obvious and thoro effect on the mode, implying certain limitations which could hardly be popular with all the fair sex all of the time. Keyserling might be spared, under such circumstances, the necessity of attempting to follow the peregrinations of post-war morals and the alterations of sex philosophies which replace each other with almost cinematographic rapidity; each one externalized more or less in dress.

Totalitarianism demands identification, as well as obedience in the comparatively negative form of abstinence. Many primitive peoples identify themselves with the totem by symbols attached to or painted on the body. Royce Brier, in the San Francisco Chronicle of November 10th, 1937, writes > "About a year ago the British concluded that a uniform gives a Fascist an unfair advantage in drumming up converts, because it is a matter of common knowledge that fancy garb has been stealing the reason of both wearer and beholder since the Stone Age days when a leopard skin was superior to a wolf skin. So the British banned the black shirts and patent leather boots, and British Fascists had to shout in tweeds, a most extrawd'nary getup for a firebrand seeking overthrow of the House of Commons.

> "Sir Oswald Mosley promptly lost the two-thirds of his disciples, to whom a uniform was a uniform but the corporate state was just so much higher algebra, and Sir Oswald groped about in obscurity looking for a stunt."

Facts like these point to a difference of sexual psychology under different social structures. We believe that there is, and must be, a compensatory mechanism at work in every situation. An illusion of some sort is the necessary accompaniment of some state of mind which may, relatively at least, pass for sanity. A well-known psychiatrist, recently returned from a European tour, attempted to classify the forms taken by mental tendencies in the different countries which he studied. For him: Italy was paranoid, Germany megalomaniac, France in the grip of a fear psychosis, etc. Such tendencies, if they had any basis, might be expressed in dress. Can the older escape mechanisms or aids to the illusion for living, in which costume plays such a major part, be changed or replaced by others of equal or superior efficacy? If there is a shift in stress of elaborateness from the feminine back to the masculine are not basic situations involved? Is uniformity a gauge of a primitive stage of social organization; diversity of a higher degree of civilization? With no conclusions drawn, or perhaps to be drawn, as yet, it seems interesting to study all contemporary sources with such thoughts in mind. Little daggers, riding-boots, feathers in hats, etc., hardly seem of much practical use in the twentieth century. What state of mind do they express?

Costume versus Clothing

"Dressing up" implies dressing in a style distinct from that worn habitually. One is costumed rather than merely clothed. Between the terms clothing and costume there is a great distinction. Clothing is bodily covering; costume, raiment.

To elucidate. Let's assume that we have a nice clean blank white page. Drawing a line down the center, it is divided into two equal parts. The half on the left will have printed at the top the word Material; on the right, the word Mental will appear.

Under the word Material, we will write the terms: Apparel, Clothing and Dress; under the word Mental, the terms: Costume, Adornment and Body Ornament. Thus if we were making a study of the subject we might continue to write in the rest of the left-hand side such phrases as "Environment makes clothing necessary," "Climate furnishing in flora and fauna sufficient to provide materials for the fabrication of garments to protect man from its own temperatures," "Economic side of clothing," "Physiology of clothing," "Technique of manufacture from felting to tanning," "Bodily comfort; physical health."

Then we might cross the line and arrive on the Mental side where we would see such terms as Sex, Religion, Magic, Totem, Trophyism, Taboo, Ego, Aesthetics, Prestige, Imitation, et cetera, all tied up with the subject of clothes.

Clothes are economically, of course, of primary importance. Food, Clothing and Shelter are the three economic "goods" needed, in the order named. Lately I read a newspaper account of a woman who had for some time been in dire financial need, and unbeknown to her friends took poison; upon which her friends at last got together and purchased a silk dress to have her buried in. Man is born naked but dies and is put away with clothes on. Clothes have a practical material hygienic side of great scientific importance. Nothing warmer than fur, ounce for ounce, has ever been discovered. Wool is warmer than silk, silk than cotton, and cotton than linen. Dr. Dearborn, of the U.S. Army Medical Corps, says that the comfort, or lack of it, in clothing means immeasurable loss or gain in the efficiency of people in all sorts of jobs. Measured in terms of money, collectively estimated, it makes the head swim.

Thomas Carlyle had his studious character Diogenes Teufelsdrockh take a look into this business a long while ago. In his book, Sartor Resartus, Herr Teufelsdrockh rather longwindedly came to the conclusion that barbarous man spiritually craved decoration while he showed considerable indifference about the warmth and protective qualities of his clothes. He was strong on the esthetic side, and craved that touch of je ne sais quoi of necessary decoration (putz). It was hinted that man, as Diogenes T. states, changed from a "naked animal" to a clothed animal for some obscure artistic reason.

I think that man took to costume before he took to clothing; he "dressed up" before he clothed himself. Carlyle's Herr T. was right when he said or hinted that ornament, not covering, was the preoccupation of the "hairy savage." There is much evidence that the savage, indifferent concerning the vagaries of temperature, neglected his clothing. The ancient Chinese and the old Greek commentators thought that clothing was adopted for warmth, but this is not a modern scientific view of the matter.

An early traveler describes a Mangai islander as "being clothed with a hunting knife which was stuck through the lobe of his ear." Darwin speaks of giving a good-sized piece of red cloth to a Fuegian who, although "he certainly stood in need of protective clothing" tore it up and distributed it among his companions who used it decoratively.

African safari porters wear all the odds and ends of clothing they can get hold of in the heat of the day, and throw them off in the cool of the evening when camp is reached. The evidence all over the primitive world, with few exceptions, seems to show that clothing plays a secondary role to costume.

Decoration first, protection afterward. Man's origin in the tropics would not point to the use of clothing for economic reasons. The primitives do not "wear clothes." They "dress up."

The assumption of the dressing up proclivity puts by the board theories such as that held by Ratzel and the older school of ethnologists, that clothing was forced upon women by their lords and masters as a means of diminishing the force of their charms. It also does not agree with the Mosaic assumption explained naively by St. Augustine in connection with the serpent and the apple, that modesty is at the bottom of dress. Robert Burton in his somewhat dour Anatomy of Melancholy, Dumaurier, Stendhal, Remy de Gourmont, Westermarck, Havelock Ellis and many others, deny this possibility emphatically.

Modesty came after clothing. Ornament preceded clothing and was worn to attract, not to hide. Salomon Reinach denies this possibility, favoring the explanation of a blood taboo as reason for the origin of dress; but it is simpler and just as probable to accept, at least in part, the more intriguing theory that men and women started "dressing up" to make themselves mutually attractive. The behavior of many "savages" supports such an assumption, for more than one people among whom nudity is the habitual state, don body ornaments and garments when about to engage in licentious ceremonies or sexual dances. They do, in fact, "dress up" for every sort of ceremony.

Ceremonial and dressing up scent of the theatre in embryo. Frazer, who gives such an excellent idea of these activities in the Golden Bough, hints that magic may have something to do with it. Tree sprites, being present in the tree and in its bark, are present in bark clothing. Clothing is again picturesquely connected with the worship of the serpent, which was the only animal which could change its dress—and therefore its personality. Elliot Smith, whose theories have somewhat more lately romantically revolutionized ethnology, claims that costume originated through the wearing of amulets of sexual power, near the appropriate spot. Crawley, differing with him, yet agrees in his Mystic Rose.

Perhaps a hunter carrying his trophy proudly thought of hanging it about his neck, or more conveniently, wearing its skin. Shining ornaments may have been worn because of a purely esthetic attraction which such objects seem to have exerted upon creatures as diversified as jackaws, monkeys, Australian bower birds and Park Avenue dowagers.

Anyway—our material, physical side of the affair, seems, at first at least, to have had very little to do with "dressing up." It is on the mental side of our paper that we find all our terms, now somewhat explained, which have to do with Costume as opposed to Clothing; Raiment as opposed to mere Apparel; Adornment, as opposed to Dress. "Dressing up" then, is the whole artistic side of clothing, the psychological side in its purest connotation—Sexually attractive, Magico-religious, Prestige imitational, Ego Lotzean stimulating, Esthetic, Architectural, War, Theatrical, Ceremonial, Caste-marking, Armorial, Totem-influencing, Trophyistical dressing up.

Costume Developing

If people are assumed as having begun to dress with ornament: The girdle grew into kilt, skirt and trousers; the necklace into cape, robe, cloak and coat. Around the diadem or head-band, feathers sprang up, flaps hung down. Bracelets, rings, anklets, earrings, labrets, garters and armlets pretty well complete the list of ornaments from which clothing stemmed, because they exhaust the places where ornaments could be conveniently worn. The architecture of the human body, as Semper remarks, forms the architecture of costume: Two pendicular ornamental earrings, one on each side; A nodding plume or floating feather leaning backward to accentuate its wearer's movement forward, corresponding with the axis of the human body. Costume, following the path of the other arts, becomes architectural. It reacts mutually with the human body. Ripley draws attention to the Basques who shaved appropriately to the way in which their beards grew. "The ancient Egyptians," says Elliot Smith, "were endowed with a respectable growth of beard only upon the chin." But the Assyrians and the Babylonians were contrastingly hirsute. Thick limbs, thick clothing. Would our friend Gerald Heard then admit that the Minoans in their highly developed anatomic costume, were naturally somewhat slim waisted?

Clothes and Caste

Clothes artistically satisfying, were insufficient. Norman Douglas, in his Siren Land, recalls Lotze's observations on the manner in which man enlarged his personality, extending it by a huge headdress and a walking stick. Happy coincidence that economically the headdress and walking stick could so unfit their wearer to perform anything in the nature of productive labor.

Veblen shows that the "canon of wasted effort," when it lent value to the chief's cloak, which was made of the feathers of a rare Pacific bird, lent value to the chief. A leisured man was he, with the leisure of others at his disposal. The rich one then hung his riches 'round his neck. A mighty man's riches were too heavy for one neck? Well, then, other necks were provided—wives, concubines and servants each did their share in aiding the display. God, the mightiest chief, came to have the most leisured servants, the tallest houses and the most preciously dressed butlers—the bishops.

If one was "dressed up"—that is to say, dressed up from every point of view—then one was esthetically satisfying, the naturally esthetic assets being properly stressed; therefore, sexually attractive, with a maximum expansion of the ego in all directions; magically protected by the proper amulets, with metamorphosed trophies visible somewhere about one's person (having taken on the desirable qualities of brightness and shininess); economically conspicuous because of the ability to wear rare and therefore valuable materials; fearless, because protected from demons, possible accusation of poverty, insignificance, or nonconformity; en règle, provided with the proper papers for one's class and epoch, pointing always toward the appropriate ideal.

"Plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose." All those things which so elusively through the ages went to make up that indefinable thing called taste. Reflected here, there and everywhere. The tightly corseted figures of the anatomically dressed Aegeans. The beautiful gravitational folds of the Greek robes. Architectural forms repeated on . . . or from humanity, as pointed out by Viollet le Duc, Webb and Heard.

But it seems to us lately that the men at least, and they have until yesterday with one exception set the styles, are becoming more and more clothed and less "dressed up." Does this point to a return to the uniformity of savagery, as Havelock Ellis sometimes seems to fear? Man's choice of clothing appears to be getting instinctively selbstverständlich.

There is seemingly little hope offered by a future in a civilization dominated by machinery.

Trotter's rationalization of the belief in the herd idea is here appropriate. It serves to justify the assumption of herd suggestion, which is so rapidly taking on a universal force and scope. "This mechanism," he says, "enables the English lady who, to escape the stigma of having normal feet, subjects them to a formidable degree of lateral compression, to be aware of no logical inconsequence when she subscribes to missions to teach the Chinese lady how absurd it is to compress her feet longitudinally; it enables the European lady who wears rings in her ears, to smile at the barbarism of the colored lady who wears rings in her nose; it enables the Englishman, who is amused by the African chieftain's regard for the top hat as an essential piece of the furniture of state, to ignore the identity of his own behavior when he goes to church beneath the same tremendous ensign."

But the tendency is toward a devolution from costume toward clothing. The "tremendous ensign" itself is becoming old-fashioned. Ever there is less of the real costume psychology in clothes. "Dressing," as a conventional art, is dead or dying.

Costume is too close to dancing, music, poetry and ceremonial, to occupy a place in a world given over more and more exclusively to mass production. It must give way to clothing, and that quickly. The headgear (the last article of costume to be given up is the hat *) is made to disappear when not sacrificed, as it usually is, without a struggle. Turkey and Persia suppressed the national headgear by stern sumptuary edict. Echoes of the "Whisker Rebellion" in Afghanistan are still heard. Verlaine's dire prophecy of the time "when madmen walk the streets all clothed in black" is being everywhere fulfilled.

The effect of unesthetic clothing upon morale is too well known to need stressing. It is mentioned by Robert Louis Stevenson (who says "a change of habit is bloodier than bombardment"), Louis LeFevre, Francis Abell in his account of the preoccupation of prisoners with the decoration of their clothes, Stanley Hall in his report about school children, and hinted at by Sigmund Freud when he remarks "of equal significance to the physician, and worthy of his observation, is everything that one does with his clothing, often without noticing it. Every change in the customary attire, every little negligence, such as an unfastened button, every trace of exposure, means to express something that the wearer of the apparel does not wish to say directly. Usually he is entirely unconscious of it."

Does the disappearance of dressing up indicate the passing of Western Civilization? If so, Spengler is welcome to the suggestion. It is certainly in youth and the virile period that the individual is preoccupied with dress. Which of us might not sneakingly enjoy a real costume, if he dared? Real costume, which is now confined to the theatre and cinema, to be enjoyed by most of us in a somewhat vicarious fashion—May the theatre keep the spark of suggestion alive until some more leisured age when the play spirit reawakens, and we may all again "dress up."

Philosophy and Psychology

There are a number of books purporting to deal with the psychology of clothing. Philosophers of one sort or another have, in their universality of specialization interested themselves in the subject since the time when Pan Kou of China said that at the end of the "seventh conjunction . . . men covered themselves with vestments of leaves . . . and with the skins of beasts to preserve themselves from the cold and the winds." Lucretius set forth his theories poetically in De Rerum Natura and Saint Augustine rather morally in Clivitate Dei (Bk. XIV, Chapter XVII). The psychology of clothing is a complex and highly technical subject that, in our opinion, has baffled all the writers who have so far attempted to deal with it. A more recent and comparatively profound book is that by Flügel of the University of London. Carlyle's classic Sartor Resartus is too well known to need more than a passing mention. H. Lotze in his "Microcosmus" interestingly discussed the connection between costumes and the ego, particularly as related to the wearing of the top hat (4th American edition 1897. Bk. v, Chapter II, p592-595).

In the newer psychology and in psychoanalysis a continued interest is shown in costume. Freud discusses it briefly under "Fetichism" in his Autobiography (2nd edition 1927-1935, p149) He has made many other observations on clothing and says that he studies the appearance of his patients from this standpoint as carefully as he does from any other one. His views, as might be expected, have a consistently sexual basis, and it must be said with some regret that a lack of acquaintance with Freudian technique prevented my giving to the well-known castration theory, the space which is probably due it in my discussion of the origin of clothing in From Nudity to Raiment.

Perhaps some day a synthesis of the different schools of psychoanalysis, including Adlers' "purpose-force" concept, Jung's "energic ego," Steckel's "dynamic mechanism," and the original libido theories may give us a clearer concept of some more profound implications in dress. These theories might very well allow of elaborations on older ideas in the same connections.

In his book Understanding Human Nature, (American edition, p248) Adler says, "Untidiness if carried to an extreme may sometimes be an indication of greater vanity than careful dressing." (In this he seems to follow Spinoza's dictum "The humble man goes nearest to the proud.") In some cases the untidiness may be a subconsciously assumed habit—one of the many forms which the alibi of the vain individual may take as the reason for his lack of success in handling the problems of everyday life."

If this sort of thing interests the reader, he would be able to follow it up by consulting specialized bibliographies relating to the literature of the different psychoanalytical schools.* These bibliographies are particularly rich in periodical literature.

We believe that there may be such a thing as an anal-sadistic type of clothing which would be characterized by its tight fit, general stiffness and lack of comfort and something military in its character. For a number of years, women masochists, particularly, subjected themselves to the tortures of the now happily extinct corset as they still do to extremely high heeled shoes. Magnus Hirschfield and O. P. Gilbert, the latter in a book called Men in Women's Guise, have studied the relations between homosexuality and clothing. The wearing of womens' clothes by male homosexuals is a carefully studied, and to them doubtless delightful preoccupation which is known in certain circles as "drag."

Clothing fetichism may at times have incestuous implications as one theory purporting to explain shoe fetichism, which is one of the commonest sorts, bases its ideology on the contacts with the mother's shoes which the child established while creeping on the floor. Havelock Ellis has many interesting things to say in his Psychology of Sex, some, rather surprisingly, touching on masturbation.

* See for instance: Flügel, J. C. Clothes, Symbolism and Clothes, Ambivalence, International Journal of Psycho-Analysis 10:203, 1929; A Dress Reform Dream. The same 11:4-479, 1936; The Psychology of Clothes. The same 12:1-98; etc.

Sexual Psychology

The importance of clothing as a sex stimulant is universally admitted. South Sea Island maidens of years gone by put flowers in their tresses to fascinate the shipwrecked sailors, at least so the cinema tells us. The girls of our cities are doing the same thing this summer.

Du Maurier makes the following observation in Trilby, "It is well known to all painters and sculptors who have used a nude model (except for a few shady pretenders, whose purity, not being of the right sort, has gone rank from too much watching) that nothing is so chaste as nudity. Venus herself as she drops her garments and steps upon the model throne, leaves behind her on the floor every weapon in her armory by which she can pierce to the grosser passions of men." Stendhal agrees with him when he says in De l'Amour, "It is clear that three parts of modesty are taught—modesty that gives to love the aid of the imagination, and in so doing imparts life to it." And the melancholy Robert Burton said years before either of them: "The greatest provocations of lust are from our apparel."

All individuals are not equally affected by the visual refinements of costume as the modes change from year to year and seem to alter to stress by display different portions of the fair anatomy. Perhaps the type most susceptible to such lures would, in extreme cases, trend toward that sort of psychopath which the French describe as a voyeur. Krafft-Ebing in his monumental Psychopathia Sexualis describes cases which were repeatedly attracted to such diverse articles of apparel as shoes, boots, silken scarves and blacksmiths' aprons.

Metapsychology

Precursors of psychology, sorcerers, magicians, demonologists, etc., have also a considerable connection with dress. Demons were (and still are in some parts of the world) kept at bay by being frightened away by masks. Charms and amulets were used to secure love or fertility or protect the wearer from the evil eye as some forms of tattooing are warranted to do.

If the theories of the late Elliot Smith, Rivers and Perry are to be accepted, search for amuletic substances and their surrogates must have played an incalculable role in the diffusion of culture and perhaps type-forms of clothing.

The buttons on the Costermonger's "pearly" suit may have come through Venice to England from the Indian Ocean. The amuletic cowry shell, thought from its resemblance to the female genetalia to be a guarantor of fertility, evolved into shell buttons worn by the fisherfolk in many places. It is said to be the basis for the Egyptian written symbol for gold. The costermongers were fishmongers before they were Coster—apple, Mongers—sellers, so their buttons were traced back to Venice where a similar garb was worn in the same vocation, and far beyond.

Further interesting theories might be followed up in connection with the conventionalized dress of Mephistopheles, the survival of the Halloween witch's hat from the medieval hennin, which appears to have been worn by adepts of both sexes. Could there be, as Heard suggests, some connection between this Gothic hennin and the Gothic spire? If so, the symbolry may be self-explanatory.

Theories

Such considerations take us back to the very origins of clothing which are so closely connected with the generally fundamental psychology of the subject that they may appropriately be treated with it. For a more detailed discussion of these origins the reader is again referred to From Nudity to Raiment, Chapter v, and the references therein. Here it may suffice to outline some of the more generally accepted theories referring, for purposes of further study, to the authors who respectively support them.

The Theory of Sex Attraction, based to some extent on Montaigne's statement that "There are certain things which are hidden in order to be shown" is best explained in brief by Westermarck, in his History of Human Marriage, where he declares that "we have every reason to believe that mere decorations have also developed into clothes" and that clothing originated mainly "in the desire of men and women to make themselves mutually attractive." This theory is supported by Havelock Ellis (with reservations), Grosse and others.

That it is in direct opposition to the Mosaic Theory as expounded in the Bible, and the Theory of Possession held by Ratzel and other early ethnologists, both the author and the authorities quoted above, are well aware.

The Taboo Theory, self-explanatory in its title, was put forward by Durkheim and supported by Reinach. The latter says that "Durkheim determined it happily in recognizing the blood taboo as a particular case." It would seem reasonable to suppose that Freud would be interested in this theory and with the possible exception to be mentioned later, lend it his support.

The Totemistic Theory, as advanced by Crawley in his Mystic Rose argues for an amuletic origin, claiming that ornamentation, tattooing, etc., may have originated "for the purpose of magically insulating certain organs." We are unacquainted with any important defense or elaboration of this theory on the part of others.

The Amuletic Theory, is closely related to Crawley's, as may be also the idea that clothing originated in the carrying of trophies or trophyistic surrogates.

I advanced an Esthetic Theory based upon substantiated observations of the behavior of birds and animals with arboreally developed vision, such as bower birds, jackdaws, monkeys and apes. Attraction for shiny objects may have suggested that they might most easily be kept near the possessor by being attached to the person. Köhler, in The Mentality of Apes; Edmond Haraucourt, in Daah, le Premier Homme; and Johannes V. Jensen in The Long Journey directly or indirectly seem to support this theory.

It now seems that an interesting if somewhat complex theory might also be built up on the Castration Fear so important in Freudian Psycho-analysis. Quite apart from any directly protective function of the garment, this fear may well be the basis for the amuletic theory. If men, as their more elaborate dress in primitive stages of society may indicate, wore ornament or clothing before women did, a Castration Theory becomes more plausible.

We can think of a few other factors which come into the psychology of clothing with an advancingly complex social structure. They touch upon economic factors increasingly as these in their turn interact with others. Certain objects and substances which may have owed their first importance to esthetic and amuletic considerations take on an economic value and tend to function as primitive media of exchange. Wampum, shells, teeth, skins, etc., finally leather and metals.

Caste and its heraldry as manifested by dress seem to have an economic basis discernible at some very early stage. Hunting was certainly an economic activity and the prowess of the hunter must have automatically been made evident. Prestige and prestige-imitation, still a powerful conditioner of dress, appear, flourish and evolve in diversified and ever elaborating forms.

Many factors in Paleopsychology are closely paralleled by more nearly contemporary hunting tribes. These parallels are interestingly and humanly discussed by Sollas in his remarkable book, Ancient Hunters and their Modern Representatives.

Child Psychology

Children have a very considerable propensity for dressing up. The effect of clothing on their personality is the same as in the case of adults arrayed for a masquerade ball except for its intensity which because of their fresher and more powerful imaginations and lower degree of socialization is considerable. With some children this amounts almost to a mania. Stanley Hall, in a report based on returns from almost a thousand persons, mostly teachers, states that among the three main functions of clothes: protection, ornament and "Lotzean self-feeling"—the second is by far the most conspicuous in childhood. Among sensitive children this is doubtless part of a gradual technique of personality adjustment to reality. In clothing we might hint that the psychology of the child may be studied through the psychology of the primitive. There is a similar pressure toward uniformity within the given group, and parents who insist for the satisfaction of their own ego in distinguishing the child from his fellows, put him to much unnecessary misery, which might increase a trauma already undergone, or in some cases even bring about traumatic results. The child's world does not function by the same or even similar standards of conformity as that of adults. In closing we should like to remark for a possible random benefit to some mothers that ideas of sexual differentiation in dress appear much earlier than may be generally supposed. This fact is generally recognized by people in all culture stages from the most primitive to European peasantry.

Personality and Characterology

Much has been written on personality, physiognomy, and characterology since the days of Nordau and Lombroso. The study of the individual from these standpoints has not been entirely disinterested as there is supposed to be a definitely practical side to such studies in connection with commercial activities, particularly in the hiring of employees and in salesmanship. We remember an outline paper in a course in "Business Psychology" which purported to analyze a man from the standpoint of his clothing by beginning at the hat and working gradually down to the shoes. Such an analysis, while not beyond the bounds of possibility would involve extremely complex factors. The tendency of the vain man toward careless dressing as observed above by Adler, and the fact that people on the fringes of society often compensate for their precarious social position by what they call a "front," should be illuminating. Investigators know that successful criminals often have very large wardrobes in a quiet taste.

Physiognomy undoubtedly affects the dress of the individual, as people instinctively know, at least to some extent, what is fitting, viz: becoming, or, on the other hand, what may help to hide or stress some impossible or favorable feature. Our own opinion of the so-called systems of physiognomy need not be given here and we feel that it would have little connection with clothing except that noted.

Practice in observation and analysis provides at least an interesting and possibly useful pastime. In a city with a climate like that of Paris a lady on the Metro wearing light colored shoes in the winter is probably there through inadvertance or temporary misfortune, as her footgear hints that she has been in the habit of taking taxis. The young man next to her with his cap over one eye is certainly not working for a bourgeois establishment as such headgear would be frowned upon if that were the case. A short distance down the aisle a still younger man who wears a beret consciously or unconsciously does not care to stress his masculinity, as this type of head covering is also worn quite commonly by women and children. Such observations are endless, as are the techniques of the individual to adjust himself to the group and through it to society in general. It might be safely claimed that the attitude, position and occupation of the great majority of men may be approximated from their dress except in cases where it is profitable for them to take advantage of this very fact by conscious deceit.

Religion and Beliefs

The connection between religious beliefs and dress are manifold and obvious. From the explanations given in the Bible to the latest pronunciamento of his Holiness, religion has concerned itself with modesty and the wickedness of sex attraction as abetted by clothing. It may be interesting to note here that the serpent is connected with these ideas in the Jewish and Christian as well as other religions. Frazier interestingly notes in his observations on serpent worship that this reptile had the unique faculty of changing its skin (clothing). It might seem to some readers that we are drawing rather a long bow if we connect these facts with the Freudian "Castration Theory."

The clothing of the priestly class throughout history has been relatively sexless, and that in a conservative way. Priests and women are the last to give up the concealment of the robe-skirt type of clothing in the process of its gradual disappearance before the spread of so-called civilization.

Readers who are familiar with the monumental Golden Bough may find a connection between the priestly robes worn by the God-King, and the concealment and isolation of the ruler and his cult of servitors. This fact was noted by Thorstein Veblen whose theories will be discussed later in connection with their main interest, economics.

The liturgical and general symbolism in religious dress is so complex and interesting that it would provide a good basis for an extended separate work. A book has been written on the Quaker and his particular attitude toward clothing (A. M. Gummere's The Quaker, a study in costume), and special laws were passed after the French Revolution granting privileges to this sect, so seriously did they take their rules regulating clothing.

The Jewish Encyclopedia, The Catholic Encyclopedia, and T. P. Hughes' Dictionary of Islam are interesting sources for information on costume in their particular fields.

The striking similarity in type-form in the dress of religious orders the world over is indicative of a common origin in the folkways. Similarities as clear as those which exist in the case of the Catholic and Buddhist orders of monks can hardly be considered fortuitous.

We may now have the opportunity of witnessing the origin and development of new religions and their effect on clothing. The correspondent of the London Times gives the following directions for the dress of a wedding party under National Socialism, "who have severed their ties with Christianity and who, as true Germans, wish to marry without a priest's blessing. . . The wedding party are expected to wear Nazi uniforms or peasant costumes or white blouses and dark skirts, or white shirts and dark trousers—thus doing away with the frivolous finery of bygone days." The costume recommended above for the National Socialist wedding would certainly be inconspicuous at a church social presided over by Elmer Gantry.

This attitude toward dress fits in quite well with the theory advanced by Dr. Ernest Jones of London, wherein a distinction is made in the religious symbolism of the national mythos. The typical matriarchal countries are represented by a feminine totem in terminology and caricature, e.g. "Marianne," "La Belle France," or "La Mère Patrie," "Mother Ireland," "Kathleen O'Houlihan," and so forth. These concepts are opposed to the patriarchal ones of the "Vaterland," "John Bull," and "Uncle Sam."

Social Sciences

The social sciences have a basis in economics. The whole aspect of clothing involved therein must be considered as a part of shelter. Schweinfurth and Dr. K. H. Stratz have divided clothing into two main types; the northern and the southern: or arctic and tropic. These are exemplified respectively by the Eskimo and the Arab. The northern type is assumed to be typical of the desire for protection. The upper garment is close fitting and a tight pair of trousers or skirt, may have been derived from the practise of tying skins about the body. It is usually termed the anatomic type to distinguish it from the southern or gravitational, composed of loose elements hanging in folds and considered as having developed from the ornamental girdle and necklace. Generally speaking, trousers are universal in the far north, confined to the male in the more temperate zones, and practically absent from the southern latitudes where gravitational clothing is worn by both sexes.

Thorstein Veblen, in his book The Theory of the Leisure Class, discusses clothing in its economic aspects, and its relation to sociology, caste and class distinction. These factors are very interestingly demonstrated at many points by the formerly distinctive dress of the guilds and crafts which disappeared in most parts of the world with the advent of the industrial revolution. Louis Bourdeau in Histoire de l'Habillement et de la Parure discussed many phases of clothing from an economic standpoint and some remarks of Dickens may be relevant, if we remember that the industrial revolution began in England and advanced far more rapidly there than in France.

The following is from The Uncommercial Traveler (Chapter 25)

"The mass of London people are shabby. The absence of distinctive dress has, no doubt, something to do with it. The porters of the Vintners' Co., the draymen and the butchers are about the only people who wear distinctive dress and even these do not wear them on holidays. We have nothing which, for cheapness, cleanliness, convenience, can compare with the belted blouse. As to our women, next Easter or Whitsuntide, look at the bonnets at the British Museum or the National Gallery and think of the pretty white French cap, Spanish mantilla, or the Genevese mezzero."

And, again, from the same source:

"Probably there are not more secondhand clothes sold in London than in Paris and yet the mass of the London population have a secondhand look which is not to be detected on the mass of the French population. I think this is mainly because a Parisian workingman does not in the least trouble himself about what is worn by the Parisian idler, but dresses himself in the way of his own class and for his own comfort."

Such considerations have by no means disappeared from the world. The doormen of the great New York hostelries and the ushers of the moving picture palaces, in that same metropolis, are costumed to outdo South American or Balkan generalissimos in their fullest dress. The employees of the Mediterranean casinos, where chance may be tempted, wear chains about their necks like medieval mayors. The wealth and social position of the most sophisticated sections of the privileged classes is still displayed indirectly upon the persons of servants and retainers; this situation reaching its apogee in the coronation ceremony of regal Albion. We are here far away indeed from the naïve pretensions of gypsies and peasants who, their material needs in clothing satisfied, can find no more suitable demonstration of their wealth and position than in hanging strings of gold coins around the necks of their women.

Communism

Some years ago, Madam Alexandra Exter, the Russian stage designer, accorded us the privilege of examining a number of lithographic plates issued by the Soviet government as graphic recommendations of what they considered ideal dress in a potentially classless society. It is perhaps fortunate esthetically that these suggestions were never adopted in their entirety by the comrades, as a tendency toward drab uniformity appeared to be the most outstanding characteristic. Certainly Russian official types now show a simplicity more than lacking under the Tsarist regime. Stalin, with his pipe, hunting blouse, cap and leggings, is a walking epitome of an economic social theory.

State Socialism

These conditions do not apply under State Socialism. The trappings of the dictators have already been mentioned. The predominant section of the population brings Kipling's poem Boots involuntarily to mind. Dr. Boje Benzon in the Berlinske Tidende, a Danish paper of conservative tendencies, gives a description of Herr Goering's idea of dress which is too interesting to skip.

"We saw Marshal Goering leaning against a table. He was dressed in a unique kind of sporting outfit. It consisted of high green suede boots, the front part of which reached above his knees; a dark green, sleeveless leather jacket with silver-edged elk's teeth instead of buttons (contributed by an elk which the Head Huntsman himself had shot); riding breeches of beige-colored suede, and a white shirt with an unusually wide collar and large sleeves which narrowed suddenly at the wrists. A Scot's tartan tie was held in place by an enormous gold pin. In a gold embroidered belt, he carried a golden hunting knife in a golden sheath. On his left breast Goering wore the medal of the German Hunting Society; a stag with a Swastika between the antlers. The stag was of gold; the Swastika consisted of diamonds which sparkled when the Reich Hunting Master moved about . . . Behind each chair stood a waiter in eighteenth century hunting outfit—white boots, green velvet dress suit, lace jabots and cuffs. I was surprised to see that they did not wear wigs. In reply to my question about this, my neighbor at table, who was well informed, told me that during hunts the servants never wore wigs, which might become entangled, like Absalom's, in the branches."

Law

The dress of devotees of justice in all ages, the survival of the jabot in the French courts, the barrister's wig in England and the black robe everywhere, need not be discussed here. Sumptuary laws have been covered to some extent in the Hiler bibliography and more specialized legal sources may be suggested to those who have a particular interest in this phase of the subject.

Uniforms

Three principal factors may be noted in connection with uniforms:

a. The desire to terrify (Grosse's Schreckschmuck).

b. The function of protection (in the form of survival of parts of armor and camouflage color).

c. The identification with the group and totem-concept.

Of these, the first mentioned is the least important. To be seen surviving as evolved from the primitive war paint in medieval armour and the metal masks of the samurai, it also appears as exemplified in the busby of the palace guard in England and Denmark and the trappings of Hussar regiments which come from the original death's head and skeleton markings. That it has up until lately played a role, there is little doubt. The American Indians in full array were sufficiently effective to require careful distribution of veterans whose advice and example neutralized to some extent the fear inspired. The history of the Kaffir wars, says Ratzel (History of Mankind, v7 p346) teaches that even European troops were not always sufficiently steeled against such a display of warlike savagery. Long range weapons have made any contemporary survival accidental or purely residual.

Regarding the function of protection, it has survived amply in the readopted steel helmet, and through the cuirassier's breastplate; also in the bullet-proof vest used by the German Army in the World War, when relative man power was running low. The horsehair plume and epaulettes are other examples. Carried to its logical conclusion, it would result ultimately in the one-man tank which has so far only appeared in purely experimental form. France, weak in numbers, may resort to some elaboration of this factor.

Gustavus Adolphus is supposed to have been responsible for the use of uniforms in the modern sense of the term. Their psychological value in relation to identification with the group must be very considerable. A number of studies on the effect of uniforms on morale have been made and some twenty years ago I wrote a treatise The Psychology of Costume in Warfare which is in manuscript form in the Library of the University of Pennsylvania.

Red has been the outstanding color of Empire. The Roman legions were predominantly dressed in it, as were the forces of expanding Britain. Victorious Roman generals painted their bodies in this color for triumphal processions and it survived on cuffs and emblems in modern mechanized armies. Georges Sorel, in his La Ruine du Monde Antique gives a penetrating analysis of the power of a common Totem as a national mythos. It would prove illuminating reading in connection with some of the above observations.

Some survivals in uniform, symbolic and otherwise, help to explain its evolution: the placing of the buttons on the sleeves to keep them from being used as handkerchiefs; the wearing of a certain type of mustache which was formerly considered terrifying; Grenadier buttons to keep the grenadiers from being hoisted with their own petards; the Nelson hook and eye; etc.

This Bibliography has paid particular attention to the uniforms of the American forces which have been neglected in former works.

Non-Military Uniforms

Uniforms of a non-military nature are imposed by society for some reason or other; sometimes from inside a group and sometimes upon a group by a larger and more powerful group. An example of the latter case is furnished by prison uniforms which generate interesting reactions on the part of the wearer. By the imposition of such stigmata society hopes to protect itself. The title of a book, rather difficult to classify bibliographically, translated from the original French, reads: "The Badges of Infamy in the Middle Ages: Jews, Saracens, Heretics, Lepers, Bigots, and Prostitutes." The color of such marks was usually yellow and its use persisted. Francis Abell in his book Prisoners of War in Britain, 1756 to 1815 (Oxford univ. press 1914 p255) mentions the fact that the prisoners were given clothes of a sulphurous yellow "to prevent them from being sold" (!). He continues "In dress, it was the aim of everyone to disguise the hideous prison garb as much as possible, the results often being ludicrous in the extreme."

This same preoccupation with clothing is evident in the case of Robert Joyce Trasker, a writer, invited by the authorities to pass some time in meditation in the San Quentin Prison near San Francisco. In an article in the American Mercury, Volume 10, p39, March 1927, in which he describes his sensations upon entering the institution, he stresses the physical discomforts of the prison garb, but I believe that the possible discomfort involved in the wearing of such garments is accentuated to such a point as a subconscious protest against their hideous appearance, for, save in the case of the underclothing, it is hard to see how their use could result in any serious inconvenience in such a universally uncomfortable environment. His description, with its careful attention to color, texture and cut seems to bear out this assumption.

"At last, I stepped out of the tub and dried myself with a coarse towel. Unseen hands had removed my discarded clothes and placed my new ones on a stool. The underwear was of two pieces; the lower garment reaching to my ankles, and the upper, extending from my throat to my wrist. It was heavy stuff, and, even as I drew it on, I knew that it would bring me hours of torture when the heat of the day set in, for the fabric against my skin was clinging, woolly, irritating. There were trousers of heavy blue material . . . rough, hairy cloth that would fade quickly and lose all semblance of shape in the first rain. They were tailored with no thought to the contours of the body. A shirt of similar but lighter stuff proved to be much too large for me in every part except the sleeves and these were uncomfortably tight about the armpits, were ludicrously full at the elbows and at least two inches short.

"Already, I began to feel as though laced into Arctic clothes. The socks I was given were of heavy white cotton. My feet, if they may be credited with senses of their own, sent up an indignant protest. Then came brogans, high-topped, built on the lines of Boy Scout shoes, but poorly shaped. Followed a cap of the trousers material, the cardboard bill fitting wretchedly against my forehead. Lastly, a coat was slipped on—a sort of jacket—bunchy and out of all proportion as it hung upon me."

A better understanding of how uniforms are voluntarily adopted by groups in societies (particularly in the United States, in fraternal organizations, schools, etc.) may be gained by reading Trotter's The Instincts of the Herd in Peace and War. Implications therein are worthy of a profound study. They are, incidentally, very timely.

In uniforms, clothing outwardly shows at least a pretence of adherence and identification with some class, caste or group. "They're hangin' men and women for the wearin' o' the green." In this manner, the illusion of the individual is strengthened and affirmed. His sense, true or false, of his concept of "reality" is surrounded and supported by the thoughts and actions of other individuals with whom he wears a common sign and mark. White hood or edged academic one; red shirt, black, brown or green. Fez, suppressed in Turkey, or caftan in Persia, by their presence or absence, as the case may be, show a mental attitude which in the ultimate analysis goes deeply into the individual psyche.

Customs and Costume

In a less obvious manner, custom influences costume. The less evolved the society, the more stringently are the totem and taboo enforced. Some rule broken in "civilized" society may cause embarrassment, where in primitive circles it would result in serious punishment or death.

Customs and costume are regulated in all the ceremonies and rituals of life. Clothing for betrothals has been shown to be still carefully regulated in some parts of the world. White is worn by the bride at the marriage and a ring after the marriage. Black is a mourning color in the west; white, in China. Clothing is provided carefully for the world beyond and efforts are made to preserve it with the body. Folk dress persists in some few localities, while in others, official efforts are made for its revival or preservation.

Hendrik W. Van Loon, in his Story of Mankind (p362) says:

> You may think it absurd that I mention such a detail. But, if you please, the Congress of Vienna was one long succession of such absurdities and for many months the question of "short trousers vs. long trousers" interested the delegates more than the future settlement of the Saxon or Spanish problems. His Majesty, the King of Prussia, went so far as to order a pair of short ones, that he might give public evidence of his contempt of everything revolutionary.

Is it to be supposed that such considerations no longer preoccupy people in the rapid stresses of the Twentieth Century? They did in 1936, as an issue of The Scotsman of that year gives the following news item:

> "The controversy over which is the correct tie to wear with Highland evening dress was again raised at a special general meeting of the Kilt Society of Inverness yesterday, when there was a representative attendance of members to consider a motion tabled by The Mackintosh of Mackintosh, Chief of the Society.
> "The Mackintosh at a recent meeting took strong exception to the Society's booklet—an official guide on how Highland dress should be properly worn—containing the advice that either a black or a white tie is correct for evening wear.
> "He maintained that a black tie was the correct wear, and gave notice of the following motion: 'That the meeting is of the view that the black tie is the correct wear for evening dress, and that the booklet of the Kilt Society be altered accordingly'.
> "The Mackintosh, however, was unfortunately unable to be present at yesterday's meeting, but his motion was moved by Dr. Ferguson Watson, Edinburgh, who came to Inverness specially to support it.
> "At the outset, Colonel George Mackintosh, C. B., Balvraid, the President, explained that the Society's booklet had been issued after two years' intensive research and was purely a guide.

"An original booklet, which had run out of circulation, contained the advice as regards evening dress, that 'a black tie or jabot' was suitable. The reason why 'black or white' was included in the up-to-date booklet was that a great many Highland gentlemen wore the white tie at a ball, and they felt it was a matter on which the Society could not be too dogmatic.

"Since The Mackintosh had raised the question, members of the Society had been asked to state their opinion, and twenty-four had replied—fourteen in favor of the black tie, and ten in favor of the white. Of the latter, some held that while the black tie was correct with a dinner jacket, the white tie could be worn with a tail-coat.

"In moving The Mackintosh's motion, Dr. Ferguson Watson said he had a feeling that in introducing the white bow there was great danger of the jabot disappearing altogether. It was not so much white against black, as probably the white against the jabot. He considered the black bow preferable to the white for evening wear. He knew the Duke of Atholl favored the white bow, but he had been at several ceremonies where the Duke wore a black tie. It was quite true that they were not issuing regulations in the booklet, but simply guiding facts to people who were not quite sure how to wear Highland dress.

"Mr. E. E. Malcolm, W.S., Fort-William, supported The Mackintosh's motion. Not only from the point of view of correctness, but from that of appearance, the black tie went very much better with a dress kilt, he said. He did not consider the jabot a feminine adornment, but it did not go with a 'boiled' shirt. The latter was altogether foreign, but they had to adapt their dress to modern requirements.

"Mr. Murdoch Mackintosh, Sheriff-Clerk of Invernessshire, who said the white tie was essentially modern dress, supported the amendment.

"On the suggestion of Brigadier-General Macfarlane, it was unanimously agreed that the whole question be remitted to a further meeting of the Society, in view of The Mackintosh's absence."

Philology

The study of the etymology of words connected with dress is an interesting and illuminating one. An etymological glossary on the subject is much to be desired, but, as far as we know, no such work exists. We are somewhat better off in this respect for arms and armor as armorial terms have been explained at some length as will be seen by consulting this portion of the bibliography.

Another interesting study would be that of slang used in different languages as applying to clothing. "Fedora" and "Kelly" and so forth, for hat; "Benny" for overcoat; "Dogs" for shoes, and many other such terms are interesting psychologically. There are also the languages of clothing or accessories, such as the well-known language of the fan, which was formerly used to convey a variety of messages in the form of signals, some of which were not unlike the wig-wag codes as used in the army and navy.

The little beauty spots, which the French appropriately called "mouches" also had a language in the eighteenth century. These little spots spoke a language in the manner in which they were placed, as some of the names will indicate. The "Passionate" was placed at the corner of the eye, the "Majestic" in the middle of the forehead, the "Playful" on the little wrinkles formed on the cheek by laughter, the "Gallant" in the middle of the cheek, the "Kissing" in the corner of the mouth, the "Offended" on the nose, the "Coquettish" near the lips. There was a special term used for the spot which the French called "Receleuse" which served to hide pimples. Long, slender beauty spots were called "Assassins."

The angle at which the headgear is worn also speaks a language and to close this brief treatment of the subject, it may be germane to quote Spengler in a self-explanatory statement which follows.

". . . and the language of costume, which is contained in clothing, tattooing and personal adornment; all of which have a uniform significance. The investigators of the Nineteenth Century vainly attempted to trace the origin of clothing to the feeling of shame or to utilitarian motives. It is in fact intelligible only as the means of an expression-speech, and as such it is developed to a grandiose level in all the high civilizations, including our own of today. We need only think of the dominant part played by the "mode" in our whole public life and doings, the regulation attire for important occasions, the nuances of wear for this and that social function, the wedding dress, mourning; of the military uniform, the 'priests' robes, orders and decorations, mitre and tonsure, periwig and queue, powder, rings, styles of hairdressing; of all the significant displays and concealments of person, the costume of the mandarin and the senator, the odalisque and the nun; of the Court-State of Nero, Saladin and Montezuma—not to mention the details of peasant costumes, the language of flowers, colors and precious stones. As for the language of religion, it is superfluous to mention it, for all this is religion."

Biology and Dress

The relation of biology to dress is considerable. The mannish post-war fashions need not be explained here nor need we go into the cut of bodices or v-shaped ornamentations on skirts. Some of the other aspects of biology in dress will not soon be forgotten. We hailed the discovery that modes in beards and hair dressing were biologically controlled, as our own, until the day we ran across Ripley's Basque Fashions in Shaving.

As an example of how far exaggerations of natural attributes may be carried, the false chin beards of the Pharaohs may be cited. Elliot Smith correctly states "that the Egyptians were endowed with a reasonable growth of beard on the chin only." Gerald Heard calls our attention to the fact that the slim Egyptians wore little clothing while the more heavily built dwellers of the Tigris and Euphrates valleys clothed themselves in much heavier garments although the climatic situation was similar.

Archaeology and prehistory have provided us with almost unlimited sources for the study of dress, and bibliographies on these subjects should be consulted in connection with the present one. The same may be said for the sciences of anthropology and ethnology which fields must also be intensively studied by anyone wishing to be really expert on clothes. Primitive Costume may be studied to a very large extent in books as there is little of it outside the museums today. Captain MacGillivray Milne, Governor of Samoa, wrote to Secretary Swanson in 1937 that the young people in his care were desirous of substituting American dress for the native lava-lava. He believes that they may have been influenced by a moving picture colony which moved in on them to take a south sea film. All this in spite of the fact that the Samoan people are peculiarly given to maintaining their own culture and customs.

The well meaning missionaries have had a great deal to do with the adoption of clothing. That unesthetic garment the pinafore (Samoan pina-foa) sold modesty and Manchester cotton. Overalls are suggested to natives as soon as there is a glut in the bead market. A thriving business is done in England in hopelessly outmoded second hand clothing which is sent overseas to native purchasers.

Robert Louis Stevenson remarks on this situation in an interesting chapter of In the South Seas, saying:

"Upon the whole, the problem seems to me to stand thus: when there have been fewest changes, important or unimportant, salutary or hurtful, there the race survives. Where there have been most, important or unimportant, salutary or hurtful, there it perishes. Each change, however small, augments the sum of new conditions to which the race has to become inured. There may seem, a priori, no comparison between the change from 'sour toddy' to bad gin and that from the island kilt to a pair of European trousers. Yet I am far from persuaded that one is any more hurtful than the other. . . . Experience begins to show us (at least in the Polynesian Islands) that change of habit is bloodier than a bombardment."

Louis Le Fevre, in an article in The American Mercury (Volume 9, no. 23, Sept. 1926, p147, et seq.) discusses the effect of the inferiority feeling upon the primitive's capacity for resistance to disease. If his conclusions have any basis of fact, there can be no more fitting symbolical demonstration of the manner in which the new forces act, than that furnished by clothing.

The savage who attempts to change his personality and allegiance, thru the external processes of dress, sacrifices all the significant and often complicated heraldry which bound him pridefully to the old group, yet finds too late that their efficacy as a passport to the new and assumedly superior one existed only in his imagination. "He-who-sits-by-the-red-stream," member of the "Turtle" clan, of the "Flying-gull" tribe, becomes simply the house-boy of Mrs. Smith, the missionary's wife. He has hauled down his colors and attempted unsuccessfully to desert to the enemy. If his white corpuscles are in any manner affected by comparative mental depression, he is a more ready subject for the ravages of one of the white man's polysyllabled maladies than his proud and less accessible brother who keeps his ensign flying and his group pride and subconscious mentality unaffected.

The most important scientific aspect of clothing is that connected with human ecology: Man's attempt at adaptation to climatic environment. It has been proven for instance that a well-wound turban is several degrees cooler than the best pith helmet. Red underwear was tried out for the American army in the Philippines. Tourists on the French Riviera are sometimes taken very ill when they refuse to take the advice of the natives regarding the proper clothing to be worn in that sun.

Hygiene as a study would of course be carried on under this heading. Pressure, occupational protection, permeability, allergies in certain cases, are said to make or lose millions of dollars to the nation every year. Such considerations have little to do with fashion.

Fashion

Marcel Proust advised us never to be in fashion or we would surely go out of fashion. Charles Morgan voiced a similar note in his article entitled "Epitaph on George Moore." He says "To be fashionable is what Moore did not desire, for to be fashionable today is to be unfashionable tomorrow."

The well-known New York lawyer, Stansfield, asked each member of a jury but one if he had ever thought for himself. The juror excused from the question was wearing a beard.

Being in fashion indicates conformity or a desire for conformity; social adaptation and a certain feeling of superiority or self-assurance. Baggy trousers and long sleeves are for clowns; failure to comply, or the lack of ability to comply, make them ridiculous. We laugh thru a feeling of superior adaptation. The opposite extreme, the over-compensation of the fop, is comic for similar reasons.

Sexual differentiation is part of every zeitgeist, differing with each epoch.

The effort of the naïve, to conform with a milieu not habitually their own, is pathetic. Two French terms endimanché (in Sunday go-to-meetin' clothes) and mathurin (yokelish) hold a world of meaning. Well-meaning efforts at conformity have failed.

At certain stages of sophistication, envy must be aroused in others and praiseworthy expenditure demonstrated. "Fine linen," formerly so expensive to buy and wear, resulted in the gradual increase of the size of the jabot, until it reached the level of the present dress shirt.

Beau Brummel had his valet wear each of his suits once or twice so that they might not have an undesirable look of newness.

Self-consciousness has much to do with fashion, group identification, and snobs. Snobbishness is a form of social cowardice. Dr. Henri Denjean, in the French medical review Guerir for November 1933, discussed the "pathology" of snobbishness which he looks upon as a form of neurosis, a viewpoint which is quite obviously not difficult to defend. Elizabeth Hawes says Fashion is Spinach showing conformity to her own group in this somewhat remarkable title. She emphasizes the distinction between "style" and "fashion." Style changes only "every seven years or so" and women of wisdom and courage, dress to suit themselves.

There is little doubt that commercial considerations on the part of cloth manufacturers, hairdressers, etc., have a very considerable influence on the unwitting public. The cinema is a great arbiter dictum. Individual and group prestige play, of course, a very large part. Spain, France and England, each in their heyday, set the style as did a Spanish princess in interesting condition, and a rather peculiarly built Viennese danseuse. Sometimes the utilization of prestige takes an odd or pathetic twist, as the following advertisement illustrates:

Saks Fifth Avenue
Presents
"VAN GOGH COLORS"

"Inspired by the recent brilliant showing of Van Goghs at the Museum of Modern Art, we introduce this series of new colors. We take the liberty of calling them 'Van Gogh' because in his paintings of the Arles period, the clear pure colors are like a fresh breeze blowing. In this freshness and vitality, and in the quality that gives the very texture of things, we found a relationship to these colors we present in clothes for the new season.

"The Van Gogh colors are shown with reproductions of the paintings which inspired them in the full sweep of our twelve Fifth Avenue windows and will be on display until Saturday. They are shown in evening clothes, sport clothes, hats, shoes and costume accessories. All the things displayed can be found in their own departments, but we suggest that the Ensemble Center will be helpful to you in assembling and matching those in which you are most interested.

Ensemble Center . . . Street Floor."

Privilege for leisure is shown in fashion. The walking stick of the overseer, in Egyptian paintings, evolves to immobilize the hands for useful labor, as do the long finger nails formerly affected by Mandarins. The fashion of the master in one generation becomes that of the servant of the next, probably originating from "hand-me-downs" when clothing was expensive and long wearing. The poet, Kenneth Rexroth, says that now the sports clothing of one generation will be the street costume of the next and if this is true, it may at least have the virtue of comfort to recommend it. Equestrian or other expensive sports have made fashionable the "bowler" hat invented by the Earl of Derby to protect the head in case of falls while chasing the fox, and the "polo coat." Inventions such as the automobile and aeroplane have far-reaching effect on clothes.

At the time of this writing, the general reactionary and escapist trend in politics is making itself significantly felt.

Costume and Architecture

Man is Symmetry. His mind has arbitrary geometrical tendencies as definitely crystallized as the snowflake; inherent as the decimal extremities. Within this mathematical complex are biologicoethnic variations. Reflections of nature imposed by the group ego stressing naturally imposed and inescapable characteristics and exaggerating them. How unsatisfactory is a thin and sparse beard when compared to a luxuriantly thick one which has been tended, curled and shampooed with sweet smelling herbs and essences. These factors form the basis for cultivated esthetic fitting each case, an esthetic which grows and develops according to geographic surroundings and their dual effect physically and psychologically thru climate and earth acting and interacting on mind, glands, and bodies, and vice versa. Sunshine or lack of it, water or desert, diet, dank dampness, high wind, and numberless other factors each play an important part.

Otto Rank, in his book Art and Artist has a most illuminating chapter on architectural origins. The role played by the human body of both sexes is clearly demonstrated. If this human body was the first of all surfaces to have been decorated, how can some authorities speak of "the influence of Architecture on Costume!" The reverse is more probably true. Costume is a portable architecture, a moving shelter. A cloak propped up on a pole becomes a tent. The step from a large tent to a small house is slight. For our purposes such considerations have only a relative importance; that of point of view.

Development of type forms, and sometimes their origins, has been stimulatingly indicated by Viollet le Duc. The Mongol tentpole with the typical curve it engendered was at the origin of the upturning corners of the pagoda roof as well as of typical headgear. The Cambodian temple spire, obviously organic in origin is repeated on dancers who dance architecturally in flesh and blood, and stone. The turban, or the wound helmet stands out in similar outline against the sky as the dome of the mosque; ancient Babylonian headgear is repeated in pyramidal architecture.

The dual evolution continues. The flat Tudor arch, as pointed out by Heard, is repeated in the contemporary hat and shoes. An old print comes to mind. A train with a black chimney belching black smoke is passing through a forest of factories. On the flat cars provided with benches sit rows of bearded men in "stove-pipe" hats. An old photograph shows the melon-like dome of the Grand Palais. In the foreground is a group of little men attired in chapeaux melons. Only when the traces of culture pass into a formless thing called by courtesy "civilization" are these profoundly fitting relationships lost.

If you wish to understand the esthetics of Dress, go to the Architect. Gottfried Semper has some appropriate observations which repose in manuscript form in the South Kensington Museum, if memory serves us rightly. He realized the architecture of dress. It is interesting to speculate how some of his conclusions might apply to present a-symetric trends in design. To paraphrase and condense, he speaks in part as follows:

> Man should be esthetically considered, neither in outline nor in mass as a visual image, but as a solid body activated by three forms corresponding to the three dimensions; first, the force of gravity, or weight, which acts from top to bottom, and retains him to the earth; second, the vegetative force, or force of growth which is independent of his will, and which operates, also vertically, from bottom to top; third, the force of voluntary activity, which gives the body a movement towards a given point, imposed by the will. The first two forces, weight and growth, are diametrically opposed and it is this conflict which determines character, form and grace. But because of the law of inertia, weight also offers a resistance to the third force, that of voluntary activity, as it does to the second force, that of growth. Fourth, we have a superior unity, the cardinal point of the being, the idea which, harmonizing these diverse forces, can make them capable of expression and the manifestation of beauty.

The primary condition of an active and durable existence is that the three interacting forces should be in equilibrium. If man had only developed the vegetative force, like a tree, he would develop in height, and the masses would coil themselves around the trunk obeying the laws of equilibrium. If the axis of growth coincided with the axis of movement, as is the case with a fish, an exact balance of the masses around this axis of direction would be necessary in order to avoid an involuntary deviation of movement. But man participates simultaneously in these two systems. He develops vertically, as the tree, and moves horizontally, as the fish. The result is that he is independent of the rigorous law of equilibrium, in the vertical and forward and backward directions. It is only from right to left, or from left to right, that symmetry, as a static condition, must inevitably obey the laws of equilibrium. This axis of symmetry, (which is horizontal from left to right) cuts the axis of direction (also horizontal, from front to back) at right angles, and the axis of growth (which is vertical).

Thus we have three forces, or axes, which correspond in the human figure to the three dimensions of space, these three forces correspond to three sorts of ornaments which Semper calls respectively, pendicle, annular, and (for want of a better term) ornaments of direction. In order that beauty should manifest itself in man it is necessary that these different centers of action reflect themselves externally in a manner perceptible to the eye.

The pendicles are related to the first force, weight, and establish the stability of the body. They should be essentially symmetrical; the conception of a single earring or two hanging ornaments of an unequal length or weight is, architecturally, difficult. The aesthetic effect of these ornaments is augmented by the moral reaction exerted upon the person of the wearer: he is obliged to exercise a certain moderation in his movements, thus leading towards a dignity of attitude. The rigid hanging forms represented by the hair and beard of the Pharaohs belong to this category.

The annular, or peripheric form of ornament, serves to accentuate the proportions of the individual; it marks the center around which it is worn, and its principal object, the head, is the symbol of the man in his entirety. Crowns, diadems and bandeaux, sometimes accented by a symmetric repetition of motif, fall into this class of ornament. The collar, marking the transition of the head to the shoulders, so important among body ornaments, and the tight belt, marking the junction of the torso and the nether limbs, as well as the bracelets, anklets, and rings, which bring out the fine proportions of the extremities, complete this list.

Liberty and spontaneity of movement attach themselves to an ornament which has the accentuation of them as its raison d'être. It is distinguished from the two aforementioned groups in that it is neither rhythmic nor symmetric. It is based upon the contrast of the front to the rear, and should be designed primarily to be seen in profile. This form or ornament may be divided into two types, fixed and floating. The former is well exemplified by the royal uraeus, which decorates the foreheads of the Egyptian God-kings, while the floating type is to be seen in the materials of the headdress of warriors. The lightness of the materials of this latter type renders them mobile, and allows them to express the general direction of the motion of the individual.

Semper's esthetic metaphysics are most conspicuous when costume is relatively free from economic influences and at the height of a conventionally artistic style wave. At times the esthetically engendered features of costume may be remarked side by side with a survival of features to which other influences seem to have given birth. Thus in the esthetically architectural coiffure of the kings of Egypt, the primitive desire to inspire fear, the Schreckschmuck of Grosse, may persist as in the ram's horns, which appear again on the medals of Alexander where he is shown as the son of Jupiter-Ammon.

In relation to these theories, the activities of primitive peoples regarding self-decoration show, as might be expected, the richness and variety of form inherent in the experimental early stages of an art. The various ornaments take on the most fantastic and variable forms, which are in most cases exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to explain. Yet in many cases their beauty and propriety are unquestionable.

Compare this point of view with that of another and more modern architect, Amédée Ozenfant, who writes (in his book Art p230) concerning the top hat; first, as to its incorporation into African sculpture which he claims is due to the fact that "their vertical lines and mass are most dignified" and further:

> "The cap will never be appropriate in solemn ceremonies. The Soviets made of it a symbol of proletarian affirmation. Their processions lack solemnity for there is none of this quality inherent in the form of the cap. Its symbolic quality is insufficient to react upon our senses and Moscow has again adopted, among its various types of head covering the 'Russian' cap which shows similarity to the high hat by the elevation of its vertical. . . . The negroes have been able to distinguish the fact that the high hat owes its expression of nobility, not to the function which it is understood to fulfill in Europe, but to the specific expression of a cylinder with vertical dominants . . . and, its particularly grave color, black."

Such plastic and esthetic considerations bring us close to the fine arts.

Fine Arts

Painting and Sculpture provide inexhaustible sources for the study of dress. They are indeed the original sources, unique and par excellence. Their use as documentation requires a special training, historical and artistic as well as thoroly archaeological. Happily, there is an enormous literature including very extensive dictionaries of artists which are outside the scope of this bibliography. The student may, and must therefore investigate these rich sources for himself, a task which most of us consider delightful.

In each case, the necessary investigation must be carried on with considerable circumspection and deductive reasoning. In spite of much debunking and successful research in the past two or three decades, popular miseducation remains beyond belief. Maurice Leloir's designs for the dress in a Trojan classic, being based upon the clothing as then actually worn according to the latest discoveries in research, brought a storm of protest because of his incorrectness (!) and departure from the "classic tradition."

Francis Kelly warns us in his review of Enlart's Bibliography (cited p xxxvi) that "In the attribution of pictures to specific artists or schools, the evidence of costume might be invaluable, more especially on the negative side." Planché's notes on a number of pictures in the National Portrait Exhibition of 1866 are quoted to clarify his meaning. There was "Darnley" and "Sir Philip Sidney" in the approved mode of 1635, "Warwick the King Maker" appareled after the style of about 1600, etc. On the other hand, a farthingale served to identify Queen Elizabeth, and a doubly arched lace cap adorned appropriately the forehead of Mary Stuart. In another far more recent exhibition, Kelly adds: "two full-length portraits in private collections, in which every item of costume unmistakably proclaimed a mid-Jacobean date, were accepted as genuine likenesses of Sir Hugh Willoughby (d. 1553) and Henri I, 'le Balafre' Duke of Guise (murdered 1588).

The Theater and Cinema

The theater and cinema might take warning from such examples, but do not, in spite of the ever increasing sums they expend for research. In former days when the Three Musketeers fenced with rapiers which had not yet been invented; or every regiment in the civil war was dressed exactly alike, we excused the "infant industry" on varied grounds. This year when a "Million dollar production" portrays French police in a dress half a century ahead of the time (for a refreshing change) or Victor McLaglen incorrectly dressed in Wee Willie Winkie, we can find less excuse. In the latter case, an old soldier wrote to the London Daily Express that "among other things that didn't please them were that the boots were not of army pattern. . . Kilt is too long and denotes a different regiment from his sporran . . . he is wearing white buff walking out belt, yet carrying rifle with fixed bayonet," etc. A proof that both research and criticism are getting down to details, which can hardly be other than a good sign.

There is a rich specialized literature on Costume in the Theatre, ranging from illustrated souvenir programs and periodicals like Theatre Arts or The Mask, to the famous Denkmaler or Monumenta Scenica and the great Doucet Collection of the Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal. Works like that of Karl Mantzius in six volumes are well worth consulting for bibliographical sources touching on costume. Other more specialized types such as La Comédie Italienne of Pierre Duchartre, or that on the Chinese theater by IAkovlev contain admirable and highly accurate visual documentation of much esthetic merit.

The Lagye Collection, acquired in 1926, was the property of the former costumiers of the Théatre Royale de la Monnaie, of Brussels. It consists of hundreds of prints, drawings, watercolors, sketches, clippings, etc., and would warrant examination on the part of anyone in a position to visit the Hiler Costume section of the Queens Borough Public Library, Jamaica, New York.

Colored lithographic plates were formerly published somewhat extensively in France and Germany, in much the same way that similarly printed paper soldiers were circulated. Of very unequal value, they covered such diverse productions as the Barber of Seville and Robinson Crusoe. Very reasonable in price, a collection of such plates would increase in value with the passage of the years. Of a somewhat similar character are the Masken Albums and Travestissements published respectively in Vienna and Paris from year to year. In a simple way these little booklets illustrate and typify the classic dresses of every "Theatrical Costumer." Pierrots, dominoes, harlequins, etc., which can be traced back through the Commedia del Arte to Medieval Moralities and sometimes beyond these to Rome and ancient Greece.

A special study should be made of the mask, in carnival, primitive religion, the theatre, love and crime. Here there is a psychological connection with the marionette, the über marionette, and the classic tradition of the ballet and the dance in general. A great list of names comes to mind which would be easily enlarged and studied in a Theatrical rather than a Costume bibliography. Burnacini, Bertelli, Inigo Jones, Bakst, Craig and Reinhardt, to name, perhaps unfairly, but a few.

Costume in Literature

The vastness of material concerning costume in literature makes this subject impossible of treatment within the present limitations. From Chaucer and Shakespeare thru the great writers and novelists of every country and historic period, there are a myriad of references to dress, of varying factual value. The diaries of Pepys and Evelyn are examples of important contemporary original sources. Flaubert, Balzac, Scott, Dickens, Thackeray are a few names which come immediately to mind as writers who were particularly interested in dress and its details. There is a whole literature of Dandyism and the History of the Fop; another very extensive one of Travel and Voyages. The classics of Marco Polo and Doughty, Rubruquis and Cook and other somewhat less famous books such as the fine series published by the Hakluyt Society are rich in quaint references to intimate details of clothing and the toilet in general. There are extensive collections of travel volumes such as the Encyclopédie des Voyages and the Tour du Monde (the latter published regularly for a number of years) which globally considered cover all periods, countries and peoples. The contact with this enormous field carries us out of our own more specialized one.

Compilation of the Bibliography

The cumulative process, involved in the assembling of this bibliography, continued for many years. Time spent in Europe allowed a considerable expansion of the collection which grew into a sizable library. Interest in the subject increased, keeping pace with it. Finally an ambition was born to write a great general history of costume and brought to a head by a visit from C. K. Ogden, then representing a well-known firm of English publishers * as editor of a series on the History of Civilization.

Work was begun on an introduction to the study of costume which appeared some ten years ago under the title From Nudity to Raiment. The experience and research necessary to the completion of this volume taught me many things. First: that my plan for the general work was somewhat impractical in a world where time was precious, money difficult and interest in the subject slight. Second: among other things that, if any success were to be achieved, a foundation must be first laid out in the form of a general survey of what had already been accomplished in the field.

About this time, for a number of reasons, it was decided that a catalog of the Hiler Costume Library should be printed. My father, Meyer Hiler, co-compiler of the present opus, had become rather thoroly involved in arrangements. The catalog was printed in 1927 and my own attitude towards the general bibliographical situation expressed, perhaps not very accurately, by the following brief introduction:

> This little catalogue makes no pretension towards being a Bibliography of Costume, yet so great is the current ignorance of the subject that it might do so with no great risk of being found ridiculous. In reply to a request for a bibliography to be furnished by the Office Central de Librarie et de Bibliographie, an organization which specializes in finding books on any subject, I was told that "it does not appear that more than 600 works dealing exclusively with costume exist at the present time", and as I already possessed more than this number, the Office hardly seemed in a position to make itself useful. The opus entitled "Art in Home Economics"; a bibliography compiled by the combined efforts of "Marion E. Clark and Others", and printed by the academic presses of the University of Chicago, gives a list of 65 books on Costume including the Encyclopedia Britannica . . . Max von Boehn, who is the author of a number of tomes dealing with dress, is given somewhat pathetically as "Von Brehm, Max", in connection with two of his least important efforts. Nor are other esteemed contemporaries in much better case. George Van Ness Dearborn of the Medical Corps of the United States Army, in one of a series of monographs entitled The Psychology of Clothing, published by the Psychological Review Publications of Princeton, N.J., admits that the study of clothing is "almost pioneer scientific work", and later states, apparently not without pride, that "Harvard University has more than a hundred volumes on clothes and costume, mostly historical and classed as works on the fine arts". The Bibliothéque Nationale (exclusive of the Cabinet des Estampes) lists somewhat over two hundred works under the heading of costume.

Such seemed the attitude and information on the part of the general public and even persons more particularly interested at that time.

There was no very considerable bibliography of costume. The nearest approach to such a work was the catalogue of the Lipperheide Costume Library, Katalog der Freiherrlich von Lipperheide'schen Kostümbibliothek, published in Berlin, 1896-1905. The books are listed in a classified order which, tho in the main reasonable and satisfactory, is nevertheless complex. Consultation is difficult, and a knowledge of German is requisite, in order to make full use of the book. Since it is the catalog of a great bibliophile, its tendency is to stress the material rather than the intellectual aspects of the works included. Of course, it contains inherent and unavoidable weaknesses from the fact that it is, after all, a list of the books in one particular library, and so conceived and executed.

Next to the Lipperheide catalog in value may be placed Colas's Bibliographie du Costume published in Paris, 1933. The Hiler bibliography is far more extensive than either of the aforementioned publications.

There has never been any pretense of recognizing the fundamentally important relationships present in allied fields, and indispensable to a serious study, or the valuable sources for enrichment of knowledge offered by the domains of Anthropology, Ethnology, Geography, History, Painting and Sculpture, Folklore, Psychology, etc.

In the Burlington Magazine, Volume 33, Pages 89 to 95, F. M. Kelly writes an article in the form of a review of Camille Enlarts' Critical Bibliography of Costume which appeared in the Manuel d'Archéologie Française depuis les Temps Mérovingiens jusqu'à La Renaissance, Tome 3, Le Costume (Paris, August Picard, 1916. 8vo.) In this review Kelly neglects to mention the great general bibliographical sources. It is interesting to note that he complains: "How little advance has been made for the last forty or fifty years in the study of civilian apparel". A long list of loci classici, some of which are almost incunabula, is included. Perhaps the chief interest in the discussion of this somewhat excessively meager bibliographical material, which as far as we know automatically closes treatment of this phase of the subject, comes through the fact that it is a proof of the inaccessibility of general bibliographical material extant at the time. The capacities of Frances Kelly may not fairly be questioned for he is the author of an excellent book on costume, in collaboration with Schwabe, which method and treatment make outstanding.

Small editions, expensive publications, difficulty of cross indexing, etc., render consultation of existing sources extremely difficult. The catalogs of the Rothschild Costume Library; of the compilers' small library now in the Queens Borough Public Library at Jamaica, N.Y.; of the Cabinet des Estampes at the Bibliothèque Nationale; of the British Museum; and so forth, are by no means everywhere available.

In this connection, we wish to mention an excellent and beautifully executed documentation, particularly important in relation to a study of costume and accessories in our own country. This can be furnished by the Index of American Design, collection of pictures of American art objects gathered by a division of the Federal Art Project of the United States Works Progress Administration.

So much for some of the more general bibliographical sources. It is hoped that the above discussion may justify the existence of the bibliography which this article accompanies.

General Works

When one thinks of general works on Costume, the names Racinet, Hottenroth, Kretschmer and Rohrbach, Rosenberg and Tilke, at once come to mind. Their books are typical of encyclopedic attempts to present the subject pictorially in popular form. One or more of these works are to be found in almost any Public Library. Their use, however, with any hope of authenticity, is difficult. Any data found in them must be carefully verified elsewhere.

Sources less known in connection with the subject may well yield richer returns. There is much data, for instance, in the volumes of Herbert Spencer's Descriptive Sociology, which, in spite of the dates of their publication, are fully as authentic as the works mentioned above. Very interesting bibliographical data is also to be found there.

Periodicals

Periodicals concerned with costume, and fashion periodicals have been listed fully. The access to materials on costume in general periodicals is considerably facilitated by the Periodical Indexes. Some of the most useful have been named under the subject Periodicals. They are widely available in libraries.

Encyclopedias

The encyclopedias are convenient sources for general and condensed information regarding costume. Articles are often accompanied by illustrations and a more or less extended bibliography. Data should be checked with some caution. As an instance of what is meant here, we cite the doubtful theory that kilts are worn by the Scotch Highlanders because of the dew on the heather. This appeared in a recent edition of a world famous encyclopedia, and would hardly explain the bare knees of the Tyrolese; or the Albanian, Greek or Afghan "kilt".

In the index volume of the Britannica, of the eleventh and succeeding editions, a number of related words refer to articles of varied interest. Under the word "robes" for instance, there is a full page double color plate. Larousse Universel, volume 5, pages 246 to 261, gives a considerable bibliography, which includes many incunabula. Other continental encyclopedias are of interest. The most extensive special article which has come to our notice appears in the Enciclopedia Universal Ilustrada Europeo-Americana (Barcelona, Espasa 1905-33). Under the word "traje" (Volume 63 p582-801) there are over two hundred pages in fine type, with more than that number of black and white and colored illustrations. This lengthy treatise concludes with an extensive bibliography.

Newspapers

There is a great amount of material concerning dress, adornment, fashion and mode in the daily papers, past and present. It would be interesting and valuable if some person or organization had the money and interest to subscribe to one or more good clipping bureaus for the subject.

In the Crocker Art Museum at Sacramento, California, there is a section showing old dresses worn at functions of some eighty-odd years ago. In several cases the newspaper comments on these gowns are framed and displayed next to them. The language like the dresses was somewhat extravagant. Challamel, from 18th century French newspapers, describes some popular colors: "Rash tears, Paris mud, Burnt Opera house, Stifled sigh," nor was England far behind. British publications for the year of 1783 describe as fashionable: "Elliots red-hot bullets", "Smoke of the Camp of St. Roche", and so forth. If these seem quaint, they are almost matched by terms in our present press: "Folly, Lucky stone, Elephants' breath, Tango" and so on, almost inexhaustibly. For a number of years a friend of the late Rudyard Kipling sent him American newspapers. Kipling asked him to be sure to send all the advertising sections, which had been removed to lighten postage. Advertising is interesting in connection with prices and the standard of living. Newspapers of a hundred years ago stressed the wearing quality of materials. One newspaper article which we saw, dated just prior to the Civil War, gave as a gauge of the Franco-American amity at that time, the fact that American gentlemen followed Paris modes. Allegiance has since rather obviously shifted to Bond Street.

Fashion columns such as that of Bettina Bedwell take on interest as the years go by. Syndicated articles, appearing in more or less sensationalized form, usually on Sunday, are less interesting. Most material of this type may be traced quite easily to books. The sources are seldom mentioned and are ordinarily so distorted as to be of little, if any, value.

There is a detailed index to the New York Times 1913- date; the New York Daily Tribune index covers that paper for the years 1875-1906. There is also an index to the Times, London since the year 1906. All of the above indexes will guide the searcher to costume material.

Museums and Societies

There are a few museums which, quite apart from ethnographical displays or arms and armour, show actual or reconstructed historical costumes. In some important cases, their catalogs or guide books are mentioned in the body of the Bibliography. The Victoria and Albert Museum in London, the Musée du Costume in Paris, the collection of uniforms in the Invalides, the extensive theatrical material in the Bibliothèque Doucet and the Musée Carnavalet, also in Paris, are examples, as is the Museum für Völkerskunde in Berlin.

These collections have a unique value. The cut and manner of sewing of old garments are strikingly illustrated when actual examples in a good state of preservation may be examined. Beside the collections mentioned there are numerous smaller collections, such as that of the Museum of the Paris Opera, and the one mentioned in Sacramento, which might really be made the subject of a special work.

There are a few societies which have interested themselves in Historic costume. The now unfortunately defunct Société de l'Histoire du Costume was perhaps the best known. Their publications were excellent of their kind and it is regrettable that because of small editions they have become very difficult to find. The Sabretache was another French society which being of a military nature was chiefly interested in uniforms. The National Geographic Society as before mentioned is too well-known to need comment. The Salmagundi

Club of New York has a collection of costume books for the use of their members who are illustrators. Private collectors connected with the theatre, pageants, the cinema or book illustrators, etc., have interesting collections, which, however, in most cases are difficult of access. It has been our privilege to see a very remarkable and authentic collection of lead soldiers accurately costumed to the smallest detail and covering a period of several hundred years. Another collection consisted of tiny hand-painted terra cotta figurines showing Spanish folk dress; still another of costume dolls which reminded us of the time when these were shipped around Europe as precursors of the more modern fashion magazines.

Special Libraries

Special libraries on the subject are as rare as museum collections. The Lipperheide Library in Berlin is the largest and perhaps the best known. Very considerable sources exist in the great libraries of the world although usually cataloged in such a manner that extended consultation is difficult without bibliographical data. The Cabinet des Estampes of the Bibliothèque Nationale (Paris) is both interesting and what is rarer, satisfactorily cataloged. The Traphagen School of Fashion Design in New York has a costume library. The Hiler collection, as has been mentioned is now in a special division of the Queens Borough Public Library, Jamaica, Long Island, N.Y.

Incunabula, Erotica, etc.

Books on costume following economic and political changes appeared relatively late from a standpoint of the history of early printing. For about a half century, roughly from 1560 to 1600, some dozen or so costume books appeared. Of these, somewhat less than half went into several editions. In the 17th century only one book which might be considered as chiefly devoted to costume was published. Such books are antedated by manuscript accounts of early travelers, some of which are mentioned elsewhere, and drawings and writings of wandering students and errant scholars.

Many illustrated manuscripts are authentic sources for information about dress worn at the period and place where the manuscript was copied. They can be seen in the rare book collections of large public libraries, for example the Spencer Collection at New York Public Library. Libraries which are sufficiently important to be able to possess any considerable number of incunabula or of manuscripts are also usually in a position to offer photostat service so that students who are unable to visit them may, with the help of a documentation such as this bibliography, obtain facsimiles necessary for the study in hand.

Before leaving this portion of the subject another category of rather rare books should be mentioned. These are kept in that portion of the library known to students as the "hell" and may only be consulted by special permission. In some parts of the world such books as the works of Eduard Fuchs fall into this category. Erotica are often interesting in connection with the psychology of clothing and intimate details of sleeping garments and under-garments which are not usually shown in better known publications. For rather obvious reasons the reader must be somewhat reluctantly allowed to shift for himself in this domain.

The study of costume is quite without limits and we regard the present bibliography as only a very imperfect beginning in research which we must, with some regrets consider as here terminated as far as our own efforts are concerned.

EXPLANATIONS

The Bibliography is in the form of a dictionary catalog, with author, title, subject, editor, illustrator, engraver and other entries all in one alphabet.

The main entry is under the name of the author, or, for an anonymous book, under the first word of the title. Here the fullest information about the book is given, in the following order: Author, title, place, publisher, date, number of pages, illustrations, plates, size, series, and descriptive annotations. Here also are given the references to the bibliographies of Colas, and Lipperheide, and numbers by which Library of Congress cards can be ordered.

Under the subject of which the book treats the information is limited to author, title, and date of publication. The subject is followed by the author's name. Turn to entry under author's name for full information.

Titles entries, likewise, are only guides to the main entry. The title is followed by the author's name.

Entries under names of engravers, illustrators, and editors, are also brief, giving only the name of the author (i.e. the main entry) and title of the work.

For example the book Antike mode, by Max von Boehn, will be found under 1, the author's name: Boehn, Max von; 2, the title: Antike mode; 3, the subject: Ancient times.

The main entry should always be consulted, since only in the main entry will be found all the titles under which a book and its translations were published, and therefore can be found listed in library catalogs.

The articles a, an, and the and their equivalents in other languages, have been ignored in filing. i.e. L'image de la femme is found under the letter i, not under L.

ä, ö, ü, å, and ø in the Teutonic languages are filed as if spelled ae, oe, ue, etcetera.

For further explanations see the Introduction, pages vii-ix.

2v. fronts.(port.) 96pl. sq.F.
Printed from the original copper plates, restored. Each design is accompanied by a leaf of descriptive letterpress with quotations from the text it illustrates. The original edition of John and Josiah Boydell, appeared under title: A collection of prints, from pictures painted for the purpose of illustrating the Dramatic works of Shakspeare, by the artists of Great Britain (London, 1803. 2v.) The order differs somewhat from that of the original (Lear being transferred to the first volume)
Of the artists, Smirke, Fuseli, and Northcote contributed the largest number of plates; the others including Reynolds, Opie, and Stothard, are represented by from one to five plates each, engraved by R. Thew, T. Ryder, P. Simon and others

First edition (Basle, J. B. von Olpe 1494)
It has been claimed that Das Narrenschiff was the first printed book to give an account of contemporary events and living persons. It was soon translated into French with title: La nef dez folz du monde (Paris, J. P. Manstener & G. de Marnef 1497) For the English edition see his Ship of fools. The book appeared in many editions. Those with the original illustrations are of costume interest, showing among other things the dress worn at trades and occupations of the period
